The Strange Comfort of Strangers

BY CURT ROSEWOOD — 2026-11-28

Why we sometimes find it easier to open up to someone we barely know.

It's late in the evening. You've been wandering around 3DX, perhaps visiting a few rooms, listening to some music, or simply looking for a familiar face. Eventually, you find yourself sitting somewhere quiet, chatting with someone you've never met before. It starts innocently enough, with the usual questions about where you're from, what music you like, or how long you've been playing. Nothing particularly remarkable.

An hour later, the conversation has taken an entirely unexpected turn. You're discussing something deeply personal, perhaps a problem at work, a relationship that's falling apart, or a worry you haven't shared with anyone. The person listening doesn't know your real name. They have no idea what you look like or what your life is like beyond the things you've chosen to tell them. Yet somehow, you've found yourself confiding in them more openly than you have in people you've known for years.

It's a strange thing when you think about it. We spend our lives building relationships, getting to know people, and establishing trust. We generally assume that the better we know someone, the more comfortable we should feel sharing our thoughts and feelings with them. And yet, every so often, the exact opposite happens.

Why is it sometimes so much easier to talk to a complete stranger?

The freedom of being unknown

The people closest to us know considerably more about us than we sometimes realise. Over the years, they've built a picture of who we are, based on our behaviour, our decisions, our successes, and our mistakes. They know our history, remember things we'd rather forget, and have certain expectations about how we're supposed to behave.

We also play different roles in different people's lives. Someone might know us as a dependable colleague, a devoted parent, a supportive partner, or the friend who always seems to have everything under control. Those roles become part of our identity, and stepping outside them isn't always easy.

Imagine being the person everyone turns to when things go wrong. You're the sensible one, the problem solver, the person who always has an answer. Admitting that you're struggling yourself might feel almost like letting everyone down. It's not necessarily that your friends wouldn't understand. Perhaps you're simply reluctant to change the way they see you.

A stranger, on the other hand, knows none of this.

They haven't spent years forming opinions about your character. They don't remember the foolish thing you said at a birthday party ten years ago, and they aren't expecting you to live up to a reputation you've spent half your life creating. As far as they're concerned, you're simply another person having a conversation.

That absence of history can be remarkably liberating. You don't have to explain why what you're saying seems out of character, because the person listening has no preconceived idea of your character in the first place.

For a little while, you can simply be yourself, or perhaps a part of yourself that doesn't often get the opportunity to speak.

The curious intimacy of anonymity

Psychologists have long been interested in the way people behave when their identities are concealed. In the 1970s, researcher John Suler hadn't yet coined the term that would later become associated with online behaviour, but the underlying phenomenon was already being studied. In 2004, Suler described what he called the online disinhibition effect, the tendency for people to behave differently online because some of the usual social restraints are weakened.

We generally associate this with the unpleasant side of the internet. People hiding behind usernames can become remarkably rude, aggressive, or cruel. Anyone who has spent any meaningful amount of time in an online community has probably encountered someone who appears to have misplaced their manners somewhere between logging in and opening the chat window.

But disinhibition works in more than one direction.

The same circumstances that encourage someone to behave badly can also make another person more open, generous, or emotionally honest. Suler distinguished between toxic disinhibition and what he called benign disinhibition, which can include sharing personal feelings, expressing affection, or showing unexpected kindness.

It's an interesting contradiction. By concealing certain things about ourselves, we may actually find it easier to reveal others.

Virtual worlds add another dimension to this. In 3DX, we don't merely communicate through anonymous usernames. We inhabit avatars, choose how we look, decide how we present ourselves, and interact in spaces that can feel surprisingly personal.

Our avatars are obviously not faithful representations of everyday reality. Few of us look quite so flawless after getting out of bed in the morning, and most real-world wardrobes probably contain considerably fewer daring outfits. Yet there's something fascinating about the freedom to decide how the world sees us.

For some people, an avatar is simply a character they enjoy playing. For others, it becomes a way of expressing aspects of their personality that rarely find an outlet in everyday life. Someone who's painfully shy at a real-world party might be the most outgoing person in a virtual room. A person whose daily responsibilities leave little room for spontaneity might discover a playful side they thought they'd lost years ago.

And sometimes, behind that carefully constructed appearance, there's a person being more emotionally honest than they ever manage to be face to face.

Perhaps being yourself doesn't always require looking like yourself.

The stranger on the train

There's a familiar idea in psychology often described as the stranger-on-a-train phenomenon. It refers to our occasional willingness to share surprisingly personal information with someone we're unlikely ever to meet again.

Think about a long train journey. You find yourself sitting beside someone, exchange a few polite remarks, and gradually begin talking. Perhaps you discuss your families, your work, or the reason you're travelling. Before long, one of you is telling a story that would normally be reserved for a close friend.

At the end of the journey, you say goodbye, step onto the platform, and disappear into your separate lives.

Part of what makes such conversations possible is the expectation that they won't have lasting consequences. The person sitting opposite you has no connection to your everyday social circle. They aren't likely to repeat your confession to your colleagues, and you probably won't have to face them across the dinner table next weekend.

There's a freedom in that temporary connection, particularly when the subject is something difficult or embarrassing.

Virtual worlds offer a similar possibility, although the comparison isn't perfect. Online communities can be surprisingly small, and anyone who has witnessed a particularly enthusiastic piece of 3DX gossip knows that anonymity shouldn't be confused with confidentiality. A conversation that feels private isn't necessarily guaranteed to remain that way.

Nevertheless, the possibility of meeting someone entirely outside our usual circle of relationships creates opportunities for conversations we might otherwise avoid.

Sometimes we're not looking for advice or a solution. We don't necessarily want someone to fix our problems, and we certainly don't need another person telling us what we should have done differently. We just want to say something out loud, have someone listen, and perhaps hear that what we're feeling isn't quite as unusual as we imagined.

A stranger can sometimes offer that without the complications of a shared past.

The kindness we rarely talk about

If you judged online communities entirely by the stories people tell about them, you'd be forgiven for thinking they consist exclusively of arguments, betrayals, misunderstandings, and people behaving in spectacularly unreasonable ways.

Drama tends to travel quickly. A disagreement between two people can become the subject of conversation across half a dozen rooms before either participant has had time to calm down. Screenshots circulate, sides are taken, and suddenly everyone seems to have an opinion about something that wasn't really their business in the first place.

Quiet kindness rarely attracts the same attention.

Nobody rushes to Discord to announce that someone spent an hour listening to them talk about a difficult day. There aren't usually heated discussions about the person who checked in on a friend they hadn't seen for a while, or the stranger who noticed someone sitting alone and decided to keep them company.

Yet those things happen all the time.

Behind the avatars are people dealing with ordinary human lives, and those lives aren't always easy. People experience illness, grief, loneliness, financial worries, relationship problems, and all the other difficulties that come with being human. Logging into a virtual world doesn't make any of those problems disappear, although it might provide a welcome distraction from them.

Sometimes an evening of music, dancing, and laughter is exactly what's needed. On other occasions, what matters most is discovering that someone is willing to listen.

What's particularly touching about these moments is that the person offering comfort may have absolutely nothing to gain from doing so. They might never see the other person again. There may be no friendship to develop, no gratitude beyond a simple thank you, and no audience to admire their generosity.

For a little while, one person simply makes another person's evening a little easier.

We spend so much time discussing everything that's wrong with online communities that it's worth occasionally remembering how much ordinary decency exists within them.

When strangers become friends

There's one small complication with the comforting anonymity of strangers. Occasionally, the person you expected to speak to only once refuses to remain a stranger.

It happens so gradually that you might not notice it at first.

You meet someone by chance, have an enjoyable conversation, and perhaps exchange a few messages the following day. Before long, you're looking forward to seeing them online. You begin recognising their habits, learning their stories, and understanding the little details that make them who they are.

Eventually, the person who once knew nothing about you becomes someone who knows you remarkably well.

This is hardly unusual in 3DX. Friendships have lasted for years, relationships have crossed continents, and some people have even built entirely new lives around connections that began with an unexpected hello in a virtual room.

There's something rather wonderful about the unpredictability of it. We have no way of knowing which encounters will matter when they happen. Someone we barely notice today might become an important part of our lives a year from now, while a person with whom we share an unforgettable evening might disappear forever.

Both experiences can be meaningful, although in very different ways.

The temporary nature of some encounters doesn't necessarily diminish their value. We tend to measure relationships by how long they last, as though duration were the most reliable indication of significance. But a brief conversation can sometimes arrive at precisely the right moment, offering reassurance, perspective, or simply a welcome reminder that we're not alone.

We may forget the name of the person who listened, or the room where we met them, but remember how that conversation made us feel.

The comfort of a passing connection

There's no shortage of ways to communicate in the modern world. We carry entire social networks around in our pockets, maintain friendships across continents, and can reach people on the other side of the planet almost instantly. Yet having more opportunities to communicate doesn't always mean having more opportunities to be understood.

Sometimes the people closest to us are the ones we find hardest to talk to. Not because they don't care, but because relationships come with histories, expectations, obligations, and the understandable fear of disappointing someone whose opinion matters.

A stranger carries none of that baggage, at least not where we're concerned.

Perhaps that's why a casual conversation can occasionally turn into something unexpectedly meaningful. Two people meet without expectations, discover a moment of understanding, and share a little of themselves without knowing whether they'll ever speak again.

There's no guarantee of friendship, no promise of a lasting connection, and no reason to imagine that every stranger has our best interests at heart. A little caution remains sensible, particularly in a world where people can be almost anyone they choose.

But it would be a shame to let caution make us forget the simple pleasure of meeting someone new.

Somewhere tonight, two people who have never met will find themselves talking. They may live thousands of miles apart, speak different languages, and lead lives that have almost nothing in common. Their conversation might begin with something as ordinary as a comment about the music or a compliment about a room. Before the evening is over, they may have shared a laugh, a worry, or something they've never quite managed to tell anyone else.

Tomorrow they may never speak again. Neither may ever know much about the person on the other side of the screen.

But for a little while, they won't have been quite so alone.
